Here's the part I think George is referring to that relates to groundwater monitoring. Also, George says Len G has ground water maps you can look at.

We asked them if AES is open to building a concrete pad for the coal ash at the AES plant property. They said they are "not currently proposing that." They would want to do the g-w monitoring and soil sampling first to see if there's a need for such a pad. They say installing a concrete pad(s) would cost millions of dollars. They also said that it would be hard to know how big such a pad needs to be until they know whether and how much of AES's coal ash is going to be regularly sent off-site to be used as daily cover at landfills.

We also asked them if they have flexibility as far as doing more than one round of sampling. They said AES would like to look at the results from the first round before deciding whether a second round would be worthwhile. They'd like to proceed "one step at a time." They said that the Agremax has been sitting on the wellfield property for 7 or 8 years and has been on the ground at the plant property for longer than that. Given that, they suggested that if there's any g-w or soil contamination stemming from that land placement of Agremax, it ought to be detectable in one round of sampling.
